Among a population of more than 160 million people, the United States has an annual average 1.24 million workers who are not employed but have a job-based insurance policy. Of these individuals, the fastest-growing group has been workers, 1.5 million workers, who fall into the underinsured and uninsured category, with 3.2 million more expected to join them over the next 3 years. However, the majority of these workers are part of a workforce that is diverse, with workers from various sectors making up the group. Covered employers may provide health insurance in lieu of salary or to supplement wages. This sometimes may be done with the hope that some of the benefits will be passed on to the worker in the form of lower wages. There are various types of workers that might benefit from health insurance, including domestic workers, farming families, and those with temporary or seasonal work. In the same time period, hospitals closed emergency rooms, lost revenue, and increased wait times of up to months for appointments.
